Hi, I'm Sandeep Regmi.

I have always been drawn to observation. I watch patterns, question assumptions, and instinctively search for the logic beneath appearances. Analysis feels less like a skill and more like a way of being. Yet I've learned that excessive logic can become its own limitation; not everything meaningful can be reduced to a neat chain of reasoning.

What fascinates me most is consciousness itself the strange phenomenon of being aware. The more conscious I become, the more I find myself witnessing everything: thoughts as they arise, emotions as they shift, moods as they color perception, and the subtle currents that move beneath ordinary experience. I do not merely think; I often observe the process of thinking. I do not simply feel; I notice the feeling as it unfolds.

This constant awareness can be both a gift and a burden. It offers clarity, but it also makes it difficult to look away. Every reaction becomes an object of inquiry, every emotion a phenomenon to examine, every moment a mirror reflecting the nature of the mind itself.

Perhaps that is why I remain captivated by the question that has followed philosophers for centuries: What does it truly mean to be conscious? In seeking that answer, I find myself endlessly observing not just the world around me, but the observer within.
